9. The five main product types are government, education, healthcare, technical and manufacturing (see Figure 6). Most are using IIS/HTTP and active/passive mode. As per Gartner's definition of a hardware refresh: "it is a re-design of the same physical hardware components and it is independent of the software or operating system platforms. [...] ." (Stevenson, Gartner, Gartner Magic Quadrant for Application Performance Monitoring, October, 2012). Or, at least, it should be, right? Well, according to Gartner, "Common misconceptions include the belief that hardware refresh is an annual event, something one should plan for, or engage in, during the off-year. The reality is that . . ." More and more companies are making purchases of equipment "just in time." "It's not that companies want to avoid purchasing these components; their budget is tight and it's not advisable to budget a long-term hardware refresh prior to the next big upgrade." And thus hardware refresh is often an emergency kind of thing, driven by the need for a system/server to be able to support new workloads. These hardware needs can be handled through a hardware refresh, which is different than a replacement or upgrade. The Garner report also points out that getting the correct hardware and taking advantage of a budget refresh to augment the technology and services you already have may be more important than a hardware refresh. Gartner thus shows that there is more than one way to go. Still on the topic of "applications," I have seen (and, more often than not, done) some project-wide IT policies which came with a few crutches (same with our research): Visually naming folders and files by "folder name" or "file name" would be "type oriented" rather than "object oriented." For example, it would be easier to find a folder named "invoice" rather than to find a folder with this name as well as "client" and "rate sheet." Sorting via "most recently modified" or "most recently accessed" files would tend to help maintain a system of priorities (rather than of a random order). Sorting via "f678ea9f9e
