First, we could not perform a formal interaction between the patient and surgeon in assessing postoperative pain intensity and the occurrence of complications because patients and surgeon did not usually have contact after discharge from the operating room. The strengths of our study was that it was prospective, was double blinded and that postoperative pain was assessed by independent observers. We think that postoperative pain assessment in outpatient clinic by independent observer would be a more valid method than face-to-face interviewing with surgeon or/and patient. However, in the future, a prospective study of effectiveness of a simple analgesic intervention in patients after arthroscopic shoulder surgery would be important to evaluate. Conclusions {#S5} ============ Our study is a prospective, double-blind and controlled clinical study. Clinical experience would suggest that the combination of ropivacaine and ketoprofen for shoulder arthroscopy reduces both pain and frequency of consumption of rescue medication. However, the combination of ropivacaine and ketoprofen does not change the time from operation to discharge from the operating room. f678ea9f9e
